

After the Execution—Disposition of the Bodies of the Criminals.

Our special telegram from Washington gives these further particulars of the execution of the assassins:

After the bodies had hung about 20 minutes they were pronounced lifeless by the Surgeons officiating, and were cut down, laid on the rough pine boxes, respectively, which had been ranged in front of them, and were there examined again. The neck of Mrs. Surratt was pronounced positively broken and that of Harrold probably. The knot had caught under the base of the skull, in the case of Payne and Atzerodt, in such a manner as to make it uncertain about their necks having been broken.

The bodies were put in the boxes in the same dresses in which they had been hung. A small bottle containing the name of each person put in with the corpse, and were buried in four graves, about five feet deep, that had been dug on the east side of the yard, with their heads toward the west.

The officiating surgeons were Surgeon Geo. A. Otis, U. S. V., Assistant-Surgeon J. J. Woodward, U. S. A., and Assistant-Surgeon G. L. Porter, U. S. A.

The bodies of all the prisoners except Payne were solicited of Gen. Hancock by their friends, but he declined to give them up without an order from the President or Secretary of War, upon the production of which he said they could be disinterred.

Co. K, 1st regiment Hancock's Veteran Corps, Lieut. Vanderviele commanding, was detailed to attend to the burying of the bodies.

The following regiments and companies were on duty in and around the Arsenal to-day, all under the command of Gen. C. H. Morgan:

1st, 2d, 5th and 8th Regiments of the First Corps, one company of the 16th New-York Cavalry and a detail of the 60th Ohio Infantry, the inside guard being composed of the 1st regiment Hancock's Corps, and the outside of the troops mentioned.

The parties who performed the duty of dropping the platform from which the assassins swung, were William Coxwell, Daniel Shoupe, George F. Taylor and Joseph Hazlett, privates of Co. F, 14th Regiment of the First Corps of Veterans.

Much sympathy is expressed for Miss Annie Surratt, who took her mother's fate so hardly and made such strenuous personal efforts to procure her pardon, and also for the friends of Harrold and Atzerodt, who visited them in prison yesterday and to-day.
